Students learn real-life lesson in fire safety

Blaze in Fenway neighborhood displaces dozens of students just days after move-in ● After residents hesitated, fire officials warn to heed alarms

COURTNEY SACCO/METRO

▶ Suzi Burke, left, a sophomore at Northeastern University removes her belongings along with her roommate at 90 Westland Ave. after a three-alarm fire early yesterday morning.

Fire officials are warning those who recently moved to a new home to be prepared for the worst in the aftermath of an early morning fire in the Fenway neighborhood yesterday.

Residents of 90 Westland Ave. said they initially weren't sure what to make of the alarms going off just after 2 a.m. until they started to smell smoke.

That prompted a warning from firefighters.

"Reminder to the 1,000's of students in Boston. Take fire safety seriously — have an escape plan — keep fire escapes and exits clear of bikes, etc.," the department posted on its Twitter page.

About 40 people, many of them college students from nearby Northeastern University and the Berklee College of Music, were displaced because of the three-alarm blaze. It could be months before all of the apartments become inhabitable again.

The fire caused damage that was estimated to be at least $400,000, fire officials said.

There were no injuries from the fire, but there was a significant amount of damage to the six-story building that is also home to Cappy's Pizza & Subs, a popular late-night stop for students.

Suzie Burke, a Northeastern sophomore from Maine, had just moved into her new apartment three days ago.

She spent yesterday morning filling large duffel bags with what remained in her fifth-floor apartment.

"The computer and the TV got a little wet, but our bedrooms are OK," she said.

Burke will stay with her boyfriend who lives on-campus while other arrangements are made. However, classes start tomorrow.

"We were able to get out and the cat was able to get out," she said, standing near her belongings. "Everything else is replaceable."

Finding a cause

Fire officials said the cause did not appear to be suspicious, but where and how it started was still being investigated.

Much of the fire was contained to the roof, which suffered the most damage. Smoke and water damage followed on the floors below.

Investigators were expected to return to the scene to conduct interviews and examine duct work as they search for a cause.

DiMasi to be sentenced

BOSTON. Former state House Speaker Sal DiMasi is scheduled to be be sentenced in his corruption case Thursday.

Prosecutors are seeking more than 12 years in jail, while DiMasi's lawyers argued that a three-year sentence is fair.

DiMasi was convicted in June on charges that he took bribes to help get through a software contract.

His co-defendant and lobbyist, Richard McDonough, will also be sentenced. METRO

Mayor to announce 9/11 plans

BOSTON. Mayor Thomas Menino is expected to announce today the city's remembrance plans for the 10th anniversary of the 9/11 attacks.

Ceremonies will include a wreath laying at the 9/11 garden in the Public Garden as well as a bell ringing and community service projects.

The plans will be outlined during an announcement today at City Hall. METRO

Boyfriend arrested in triple homicide

LAWRENCE. A mother and her two children were fatally shot yesterday allegedly by the mother's boyfriend.

Milka Rivera, 39, her daughter Sachary Montanez, 19, and her son, Maxariel Montanez, 16, were found dead inside a bedroom of their home about 2 a.m. yesterday.

Jose Luis Tejada, 40, the boyfriend of Milka Rivera, was arrested for the murders and will be arraigned today, authorities said.

Beer brawn could equal Octoberfest

- Boston brewer sponsors stein-hoisting competition
- Your muscles could land you a vacation in Germany

It's almost fall, which means Octoberfest is just around the corner, and if you want a free trip to Germany you better start working on those biceps.

During the entire month of September and through Oct. 15, bars throughout Boston and across the nation, will have people hoisting huge, liter-sized stein glasses for a chance to become a mug holding champion.

"We have a group of people on stage or at the front of the room with a liter stein filled with beer," said Katie Piepiora, public relations supervisor for Samuel Adams. "Judges monitor to make sure they have their arm out completely straight and not spilling beer. As soon as they bend their arms or spill they kicked out of the lineup."

The winners will be whittled down nationwide for a final competition and a chance to take home the Octoberfest glory, as well as a trip to Germany to experience the real deal — days long drinking festivities where some of the world's best beers are brewed.

Hosted by Sam Adams, a list of the longest beer-glass holding drinkers will be compiled and put on the Boston brewery's website.

The best part of the competition?

Even if you lose the hoist, you get to guzzle the beer.

Winners will be announced in October, said Piepiora.

Gun charge for teen, but killer sought

A 16-year-old was charged with carrying a gun as police were searching for the person who killed a teen in the South End this weekend.

Police said an 18-year-old man was found near West Brookline and Tremont streets with multiple gunshots wounds that later proved to be fatal.

Witnesses told police a gold car was seen leaving the shooting. Police caught up to a car matching the description a short time later and two people fled when the car stopped.

Officers were able to catch the 16-year-old and charged him with having a gun, although he had not been charged with the murder. METRO

US must keep up fight or risk more attacks

- Envoy says there's more work to be done in Afghanistan against Taliban
- Stable country is 'the ultimate guarantee there will not be another 9/11'

The United States must keep fighting the Taliban or risk more attacks like those of Sept. 11, 2001, because the insurgent group is a ruthless enemy that has not cut ties to al Qaeda, the U.S. ambassador to Kabul said.

Ryan Crocker, a career diplomat who was ambassador in Iraq, also warned the United States would have to spend billions more in the coming years to bolster Afghanistan's government and security forces as its own troops prepare to return home.

"What we have to do is I think demonstrate the strategic patience that is necessary to win a long war," he told Reuters, in an interview ahead of the 10th anniversary of the attacks.

"It is going to require more resources, it's going to require time. I hope we can bring all those to bear, because as hard, painful [and] expensive as this has been in blood and treasure, it has cost a lot less than 9/11 did."

Crocker described building a stable Afghanistan as "the ultimate guarantee that there will not be another 9/11."

Mortgage crisis Obama priority

DETRIT. Tackling the housing market's woes is a "high priority" for President Barack Obama, a White House official said yesterday; but the aide would not say whether housing-related measures would be in Obama's jobs speech later this week.

"There is no question that there are far too many working families who are concerned about the challenge of affording their mortgage payment every month," said White House spokesman Josh Earnest. REUTERS

Black ancestry link to allergies

NEW YORK. In a new study of 2-year-olds in Boston, black kids were twice as likely as white kids to have an immune response to foods such as peanuts, milk and eggs — and almost four times as likely to have a "sensitization" to three or more foods.

While food sensitization doesn't necessarily pose any danger on its own, kids who are sensitized to certain foods are more likely to develop full-blown allergies to them in the future. REUTERS

Wet and wetter: Coasts brace for more flooding

The hits keep coming: First Irene, then Lee Extreme weather lingers

Still mopping up after tropical storm Irene, Vermont and other Northeastern states were placed under a flash flood watch yesterday as more rain headed their way.

The National Weather Service issued flash flood watches yesterday afternoon lasting through today for a vast swath of the Northeast, including flooded areas of Vermont and parts of New Hampshire, Maine, Massachusetts and Connecticut down through Pennsylvania, New York and New Jersey.

"This is a potentially dangerous situation" the NWS said in a statement on its website. "Areas hard hit by Tropical Storm Irene last week will be susceptible to more flash flooding given the already wet and eroded ground. It will not take much rainfall to cause flash flooding in this situation." REUTERS

Gulf Coast residents prepared for a third day of severe weather yesterday as the remnants of Tropical Storm Lee continued to lash the region.

Bush ally a believer, praises 9/11 response

Former Australian prime minister stays the course in his praise of personal friend W.'s handling of 9/11

Critical history

The day before the attacks, on Sept. 10, 2001, Prime Minister John Howard met President George W. Bush for the first time. They spent four hours together, including talks over lunch at the White House, starting what became a strong political alliance and personal friendship.

- "We didn't talk about terrorism," Howard said. "Nobody knew this terrible event was just around the corner."
- On Sept. 11, Howard was in his Washington hotel, only a few blocks from the White House, when the first attack happened.

Australia's former Prime Minister John Howard, a surprise witness to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, believes former President George W. Bush deserves more praise for his response and for stopping further attacks.

In an interview to mark a decade since the attacks, Howard said he has no regrets about joining the war in Afghanistan, cautions against an premature withdrawal of troops, and said history will vindicate Bush's response to the new threats.

"The decisions I believed were right," Howard said. "I still believe they were right, and I believe history will vindicate them."

In Australia, the latest polls show 64 percent believe Australian forces should be withdrawn from the war in Afghanistan, compared with 47 percent 12 months ago. "It would be a big error for the allies to pull out prematurely," Howard said.

The events of Sept. 11 came at the halfway mark of Howard's term as prime minister, and had a profound impact on his next six years in office, propelling national security to the equal top political issue alongside economic management.

The attacks helped cement a close personal and political alliance between Howard and Bush, who named Howard a "man of steel" for his steadfast support of the United States, and fundamentally reshaped the Australia-U.S. military alliance, which had been the bedrock of Australia's security for 50 years. From the editor's desk

A week of reflection

Much has been written in the last 10 years about the effect the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, had on the United States and her relationship with the wider world.

This week, Metro devotes much of its editorial pages to examining that and other issues, as we approach the 10th anniversary of the attacks.

Today, we look at the way America and Americans were changed by the shocking trauma of that Tuesday morning.

September 10 of that year was only 24 hours — but it represented a different world.

A NATION DIVIDED

POST-9/11, AMERICA'S GRAND IDEALS ARE TARNISHED

BY
TODD GITLIN

SOCIOLOGIST AND CULTURAL COMMENTATOR, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

On Sept. 10, 2001, the United States of America was busy pursuing its differences, as usual. Culture wars flourished. The population was growing more suburban, less white, more foreign-born, more Western and Southern. The ill feeling that followed the appointment of George W. Bush as president of the United States by a 5-4 Supreme Court decision had not dissipated much, if at all. That day, The New York Times editorialized against proposed Bush tax cuts, and Sean Hannity's immigrant-phobic radio show went into national syndication.

The next day, the Bergen Record was saying, "Almost all of our concerns suddenly seemed trivial in the face of this monumental tragedy." And the Topeka Capital Journal editorialized: "Our petty differences, over politics, over race, over the economy, will melt away just as surely as the glass and metal of the World Trade Center."

Well, no. The longing may have been real, and the collective effort on display in the days, weeks, and months after Sept. 11 was often inspiring. But it was hard for an extraordinarily diverse country to agree for long on what America stood for, besides grief, cooperation, and pride. The blazing jet fuel that melted away the pillars of the World Trade Center did not melt away differences, though some officials tried gagging dissenters. President Bush's press secretary, Ari Fleischer, famously chastised a TV comedian that Americans "need to watch what they say, watch what they do." Eighteen months later, on the eve of the Iraq war, the Dixie Chicks, who had both the top-selling album and single at the time, had their songs pulled from play lists when one of them, Natalie Maines, not previously known for her political leanings, said she was "ashamed the president of the United States is from Texas"— ashamed, that is, that he was taking the country to war on the basis of false and cherry-picked information. Angry listeners called stations to denounce her as unpatriotic. Other media muzzled themselves.

For some time, the sudden gasp of impotence produced spasms of would-be omnipotence. By the time America returned to its normal dissension, it was too late to stop a misguided war predicated on a fantasy that joined the feeling of absolute vulnerability to absolute rectitude and absolute paranoia. "They" had it in for us, so we would destroy "them." If a network of fanatical masterminds could strike us anywhere from a shifting faraway base, we would have to be more powerful than the sum of all other forces on the face of the earth—forever.

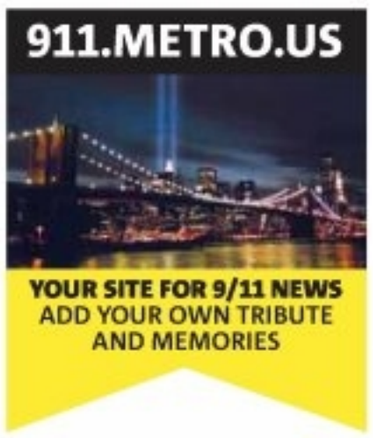
If on Sept. 10, 2001, America was united in disbelief that anyone could hijack airliners, crash them on these shores, and massacre thousands of human beings in the name of a crazy and vicious ideology, then for some time afterward America toyed with near-unity at the cost of mental self-decapitation.

Quoted

"It was hard for an extraordinarily diverse country to agree for long on what America stood for."

"Americans have resumed a long, slow ebbing of collective confidence in our institutions."

"No gadgets will substitute for the lost dream of an American destiny that would be more than the sum of its parts."



But reality proved resistant to the messianic fantasy of remaking the world at will — whether America's or al-Qaeda's. The tyrant Saddam Hussein was not in cahoots with the Islamist al-Qaeda, and neither was in cahoots with south-of-the-border immigrants, Muslim-Americans, abortion doctors or "uppity" same-sexers — other targets of hatred on the part of those who felt that their country was under assault by aliens.

The unity of Sept. 11, 2001, could not be sustained, and since then, Americans have resumed a long, slow ebbing of collective confidence that our institutions are as capable as each of us wishes we individually were.

We are doubtful about all authorities. Expert opinion is under fire from every direction. None of the branches of government inspire confidence, nor do big business, schools or national media. The Afghanistan and Iraq expeditions have boomeranged; Americans have grown grumpier about foreign expeditions. Americans will tell pollsters they think the country is in decline — though they did so in similar numbers 20 years ago. Whether they trust the polls themselves is doubtful.

As the dust clears, America remains a tangle of clashing values, divergent goals, and not-always-acknowledged doubts. Traditional optimism has worn thin, whether about economic prospects, national standing or moral virtue.

Patently, the country is in a bad mood, not least because it turned out that the forces capable of wrecking workplaces and throwing people out of their homes wore white collars and cufflinks, not turbans. About this, there is much agreement, but no focused course of action follows.

Meanwhile, a vocal minority, with a grip on a major political party, counsels that the most dangerous enemy is the taxpayer-fueled U.S. government—along with its educated, secularist supporters. Amid the general jitters, rumbles of xenophobia resound and demagogic conspiracy theories flourish. Many people assume that somebody must be in charge — a small malevolent group, most likely, for wasn't America born innocent and Americans destined to be a chosen people, and therefore shouldn't our failings be somebody's fault? On the other hand, more Americans are probably bewildered because nobody seems to be writing the script, and alarmists, whether about climate change or economic slump, are met with skeptical glares because they too purport to be experts. We yearn for rescue — as many in 2008 thought Barack Obama would deliver us as we stood by and watched — and in more realistic moods doubt it is possible.

It's fair to say, in summary, that America's quandaries cannot be resolved by rounding up external suspects. Enemies we have, but they are not so lethal or grave as to smother our deeper dissensions. The larger trouble is that our grand ideals are badly tarnished — except perhaps for the hope that faster, more mobile, more reliable round-the-clock communication and other technologies will remedy ignorance, cure disease, extend life, arrange for appropriate dates, and end boredom. But the next app, drone, database, networking platform or banking "product" will not restore America's place as the world's city upon a hill. Confidence in technological gadgetry may remain our abiding faith, but no gadgets will substitute for the lost dream of an American destiny that would be more than the sum of its parts.

FOR ALL THIS, ARE WE ANY SAFER?

Vast changes in security over the last decade have been constantly scrutinized ACLU says government has taken advantage of technology, privacy Security officials say airports safer now than 10 years ago because of training, technology

▶ A combination of images shows an airport staff member demonstrating a full body scan at Manchester Airport in England and a computer screen showing the results.

They're the four words all commuters and travelers have come to know by heart over the last decade.

See something? Say something.

The vigilance campaign has been drilled into the heads of the traveling public, and it's just one of the many security measures that have been enacted since shortly after Sept. 11, 2001.

While security officials and law enforcement attribute those measures to making the traveling public safer, not everyone sees the benefit of every program enacted.

"The executive branch has taken advantage of our technological revolution and … in the atmosphere of continued fear-mongering, Congress has not only failed to curb the executive violations, but has ratified them," said Hina Shamsi, the director of the national security project for the American Civil Liberties Union. "In the 10 years since, the reality is: For all of the resources and our national treasury that has been spent on surveillance, there is no objective evidence that we are safer."

The ACLU has continually scrutinized various programs put in place after the 9/11 attacks.

Most recently it has filed a Freedom of Information lawsuit against the government for what it said is a failure to release documents about the FBI's nationwide system of collecting and sharing reports from local and state agencies about "vague and expansively defined suspicious activity."

It also sued on behalf of U.S. citizens on the "no fly" list, and three years ago lost an attempt to sue against the Bush Administration's warrantless wiretapping program.

For Donald Hafner, a political science professor at Boston College whose teaching field includes national security, the issue goes beyond the question of privacy.

"You used to visit government buildings in Washington or go watch Congress in session … now we have concrete barriers around buildings," Hafner said. "Maybe it is stranger to think of a world in which that didn't exist. The psychological impact on American society is something not to be dismissed."

▶ Fulop

Steve Fulop had just been promoted from an analyst to associate at Goldman Sachs when the 9/11 attacks occurred. A downtown Jersey City resident who commuted every day into Lower Manhattan, he knew he couldn't simply go back to life as usual after Sept. 11th, 2001.

"I looked at the senior people I was working with and felt that there had to be more than just working in finance," said Fulop. "I always felt service was important. … And after being three blocks away from the towers when they fell, I thought it was the right thing to do. So I enlisted in the Marine Corps."

Fulop, now 33, was sent to Iraq. He's now a Councilman in Jersey City, and running for mayor there.

His story is a compelling one, but he is hardly alone.

have proven worthy, Hafner said, others might not be worth their price.

"We are safe, but we are doing a lot of things which are costly and a fair number of things probably which are not justified and have not contributed to our domestic security," Hafner said.

For those in charge of ensuring the safety of travelers, the changes in security over the last 10 years have proved worth it.

Despite the outcries from organizations and the public when body imaging scanners were introduced or other methods were implemented, officials said it's an issue of education.

"Once we educate people on what we're doing, they'll understand why we're doing it," said George Naccara, the Transportation Safety Administration's federal security director for Massachusetts. "Improved security education and outreach, sending the proper message — all of that is important."

Naccara said in a recent interview that he feels Logan Airport, which served as the launching point for the two planes that eventually crashed into the World Trade Center towers, is "unequivocally" safer than 10 years ago.

He attributes that to personnel training and technology, like the eventual adaptation of electronic analysis that would utilize software to pull up a traveler's flight history and criminal record and send that information to the checkpoint to assess the risk.

"That thought has always kept the leadership of the airport focused," he said. "The leaders here have never forgotten what happened here and have vowed to never have that happen again."

National Park Service park ranger Eugene Kuziw wipes sweat from his brow in the crown of the Statue of Liberty in May 2009, just after Secretary of the Interior Ken Salazar announced that the top level of the famous monument, closed to the public after the 9/11 terrorist attacks, would open again on July 4 of that year.

The crackdown

September 2001: Various landmark buildings and monuments were closed to the public or set up with restricted access and metal detectors. The Statue of Liberty, for example, wasn't fully reopened after the attacks until 2009.

October 2001: About a month after the attacks, Congress passed the Patriot Act with little debate. The law gives authorities the ability to track and intercept communications and get "roving wiretap" court orders. This redefined certain crimes and allows investigators to seize "any tangible things" relevant to a security investigation.

August 2006: The U.S. Court of Appeals in New York decided that the government could employ "random, suspicionless container searches" in order to safeguard mass transit facilities – like subway systems – from terrorists.

March 2010: The TSA expanded its full-body scanning program by 10 times, adding 450 machines nationwide starting with Boston's Logan Airport.

the United States military ranks

In the days and months after 9/11, as a stunned and grieving nation struggled to heal itself, patriotism surged. Thousands of American men and women were motivated to join the U.S. armed forces. According to military recruitment numbers, more than 1.6 million people enlisted in the either the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Air Force or National Guard after the 9/11 attacks. The most famous perhaps is Pat Tillman, the NFL star who turned down a $3.6 million contract with the Arizona Cardinals to join the Army. He was killed by friendly fire in Afghanistan.

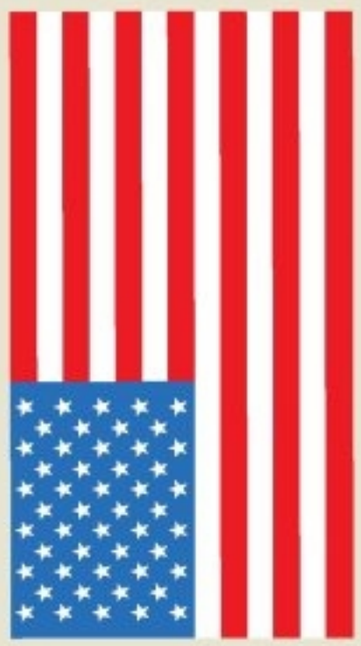
"I looked at the senior people I was working with and felt that there had to be more than just working in finance." FULOP

Immediately after 9/11, Congress gave the Army the authority to expand its ranks of active-duty soldiers. Army recruiters also stepped up efforts to bring in new troops, such as increased pay. The maximum age of new recruits was also raised from 34 to 42.

Some have died. Others have been maimed.

But Fulop doesn't regret his decision at all.

"This was the greatest learning and growing experience I have had," he told Metro. "Today, I am thankful every day that I am home and safe, and I think nearly every day about soldiers and their families that are still in danger. I don't think I thought about it the same before I served." CARLY BALDWIN



NYC and US still accepting of Muslims

- Young Muslim American says NYC was too diverse post-9/11 to shun anyone for their religion
- Though he has noticed some in mass media take different tones

Two months after September 2001, Pottsville, Pa., native Sameer Rashid moved to New York City to work on Wall Street, a career he eventually left for opportunities in clean energy.

He understood what a serious event 9/11 was, but quickly found out that New York City was different than other places in America when it came to people differentiating the terrorists from Muslim Americans.

"Even though it happened here, you still have a different experience than in other states or places," Rashid, 31, said recently from his home in Brooklyn Heights.

▶ Rashid

But he also remembers watching television and reading newspapers. There was an odd tone toward Muslims for a time after 9/11. "In certain cases for a while, it was alright to say hateful things about Muslims," he said. "It was tolerated for a while and to an extent still is."

Still, for immigrants from places like Pakistan in the 1970s — as is the case with Rashid's mother and father, a doctor in Pottsville ever since — to new immigrants from all over the Muslim world, Rashid said the American dream still motivates the earnest, hard workers.

"A lot of Muslim Americans, more recent immigrants who didn't come here for the same professional reasons: Why are they happy if they're in a situation that the economy is bad?" Rashid poses. "If you compare the life and opportunity you have here, even in the challenging situation, it's better than the country they came from."

BRIAN X. MCCRONE

ON PAKISTAN:

▶ "Pakistan is very much like America, slightly center right, it's a gun culture, it's got a religious aspect and conservative religious aspect, but also a flavor for freedom and liberty. It's also a military-industrial country, so they have problems related to those issues."

ON ARAB SPRING:

▶ "What's going on in the Muslim world hits close to home. At home or at Friday prayers in New York, specifically, in the last few times, there's been a situation where there is an imam doing a sermon, talking about 'throwing off these tyrants, dictators [and] let's hope their accomplishments are continued or protect the people and God helps them in the next step.'"

Metro talked to a cop and a firefighter who were in New York on Sept. 11, to find out what their lives were like before and after the event. Jim McCaffrey and Glen Klein are one of hundreds of first responders who have the carnage of 9/11 imprinted on their brains — resurfacing in nightmares — and struggle daily to move forward.

Interview with first responders

FIREFIGHTER: JIM McCAFFREY

"You would train for every eventuality ... but no one ever envisioned planes crashing to the towers." JIM MCCAFFREY

POLICE OFFICER: GLEN KLEIN

"I was not a drinker before. I used to get hangovers. But I needed a way to escape the pain that I was feeling." GLEN KLEIN

Ten years after 9/11, the life of a firefighter is in no doubt different, but according to Jim McCaffrey, an active firefighter for the past 26 years, the biggest change in the job comes in the mentality and thought process. McCaffrey was one of thousands of police officers and firefighters who responded to Ground Zero that day.

McCaffrey said the attacks were the first time the concept of terrorism was introduced as a possible threat.

"Terrorism wasn't talked about," he said. "Prior to 9/11 you would train for every eventuality you can think of, but no one ever envisioned planes crashing to the towers."

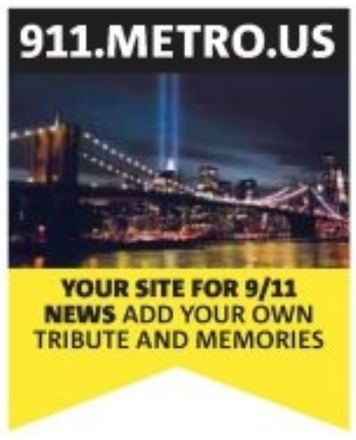
McCaffrey, who lost his brother-in-law Orio Palmer that day, explained that before the attacks, firefighters trained and prepared for incidents such as a major subway crash or a large scale building collapse.

"Now we try to be more proactive because people are intentionally trying to do damage to the city," he said.

Terrorism forced firefighters to approach any small-scale incident as a potential threat for something bigger.

"The mode of thinking has changed in a way that wasn't prevalent in the past," he said. "Now you always wonder if there's more than meets the eye."

MARY ANN GEORGANTOPOULOS



Before 9/11, Glen Klein worked with the NYPD's "Emergency Services Unit" — "The cops that the cops call when they need help," he says.

But after 9/11, Klein found himself drinking, without a job and a cough that wouldn't quit. Klein, now 53 and living in Long Island, was assigned to a Flushing unit in September 2001. He was supposed to start work at 4 p.m., but saw the Twin Towers on fire on the television and sped into Manhattan.

He and fellow officers arrived downtown just as the first tower collapsed.

"It was just total chaos," he remembers. He saw fellow cops coated in white debris, and "a huge cloud of dust."

He spent days after that — 800 hours total — digging through the rubble, searching for seven rescue worker peers who never surfaced.

Those days haunted him — he started drinking to drown out the memories and retired earlier than he'd planned, after 20 years.

"I wasn't feeling good, both psychologically and physically," he said. "I didn't want to get hurt, and I didn't want to get anyone else hurt."

Before 9/11, in his unit, he said, "We deal with death and destruction on a daily basis ... We deal with the worst of the worst and it never, ever caused me to have to drink before."

He tried to start his own business, but couldn't get out of bed in the morning, drained by nightmares.

Now, Klein is on medication, diagnosed with PTSD, and sleeps better. He can go to dinner and stop after one glass of wine. Like many responders, he has scarring in his lungs and developed asthma. ALISON BOWEN

How the entertainment industry both reacted to and adapted after 9/11

When entertainers witnessed the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, they took action the best way they knew how ● Music, film and TV that healed

▶ "Iron Man" is part of the trend toward escapist entertainment.

Rise of superheroes and huge comedies

There has been a palpable shift in the entertainment industry post-9/11, and it can be summed up in one word: escapism.

"In the past 10 years, it's become easier to get a good comedy or good action-adventure, Marvel comic-type picture green-lit," says producer Jane Rosenthal, who is behind the "Fockers" franchise.

Producer Peter Tolan has seen a bump in escapist entertainment; but more directly, he has witnessed a "lightening up" of network television. "Even the darkness in my show, 'Rescue Me,' is a little sunnier than it may have been in the past," he says.

Still, both producers are quick to add this is not a reaction solely attributed to the events of Sept. 11, 2001. Technology, Rosenthal says, has made significant changes to the business.

"Ten years ago, there was no iPad. [Now we] make movies that you want to go to to get another kind of experience, one you can't get on whatever device you're using at home."

Revitalization

Rebuilding downtown, one movie at a time

Jane Rosenthal witnessed the 9/11 attacks and wanted to help. As a film producer, her skill set wasn't exactly suited for rescue efforts. But her work in the last 10 years has been instrumental to the revitalization of lower Manhattan.

"'What could we do?'" Rosenthal recalls asking herself and partner Robert DeNiro, who co-founded the film and TV company Tribeca Productions in the neighborhood in 1989. "'OK, we could put on a show and give our community something to smile about and give everyone a reason to go downtown again,'" she says, was their answer.

The resulting Tribeca Film Festival premiered in Nov. 2002 with only 120 days of planning. "We didn't have a sponsor, we didn't have a budget, we didn't have any films," Rosenthal says with a laugh. "So we called the governor, called some of our friends — Ed Burns, Marty Scorsese, Meryl Streep. We weren't going to wait for someone to just come and help us — it was, 'We're going to take care of our community ourselves.'"

"Outside of Sarajevo, we're the only film festival that was started because of an act of war."
JANE ROSENTHAL

That rehabilitation included emotional healing as much as physical rebuilding.

"Outside of Sarajevo, we're the only film festival that was started because of an act of war," Rosenthal says. "Film can go places and say things and activate people in ways that are far more profound than a politician, and that's what we set out to do."

▶ The series finale of "Rescue Me," starring Denis Leary, airs tomorrow at 10 p.m. on FX.

Honoring firefighters by telling their stories

Few pop culture contributions have captured the psyche of New York City post-9/11 quite like "Rescue Me."

Created by Peter Tolan and Denis Leary, who also plays firefighter Tommy Gavin, "Rescue Me" centers on the self-destructive antics of Tommy, who is haunted by his cousin, a FDNY member who died on 9/11.

"[The first responders] don't really deal with [the effects of 9/11] directly because they are still jumping on the rig," says Leary. "Tommy and these guys have been avoiding a lot of it or trying to drink it away or f— it away. That's sort of a common thing for guys who are still at war, you know, on the job."

Though 9/11 was a touchstone for the series, Tolan stresses they were very careful not to lean on the event too heavily. "We never wanted to be accused of diminishing the tragedy into a story point," he says. A sense of humor Leary calls "very organic to living in a firehouse" helped "Rescue Me" achieve that through seven seasons. Humor, Tolan says, "is how people move forward. They laugh and they bust each other's balls, and life goes on."

"'Rescue Me' was a peek inside bravery. It was brave men and what they do, how they behave."
DENIS LEARY

The series, however, has reached its end, pegged to the 10th anniversary of 9/11. Leary says this last season, which has made the anniversary a prominent storyline, is "a natural summing up" for the characters as they are forced to re-examine the events of that day.

But "Rescue Me" has always refused to let their heroics, despite the repercussions, be forgotten.

Healing

The power of music

Paul McCartney sat on the tarmac at JFK Airport when the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center took place. Later, watching the events unfold on TV, he quickly realized his part in helping out — organizing an all-star benefit concert.

"More than words, more than speeches, more than comedy — which are all important — music has some property that can really be very healing," the former Beatle says.

The days following 9/11 are documented in "The Love We Make," a cinema verite film by Albert Maysles chronicling McCartney's experiences around Manhattan, including his preparation for The Concert for New York City. The film premieres Saturday at 9 p.m. on Showtime.

THE DIARY OF A 9/11 SURVIVOR

Lauren Manning

Former employee of Cantor Fitzgerald and author of 'Unmeasured Strength'

Lauren Manning almost died on 9/11. But thoughts of her son pulled her through. Here, she records the key moments in her recovery since that day a decade ago.

September 11, 2001

I take a taxi to the World Trade Center, where I work at Cantor Fitzgerald; I'm annoyed to be running late. As I enter the ground-floor lobby of the north tower, I am engulfed by a wall of fire and burned over 82 percent of my body. I run from the building in flames, and the urge to simply close my eyes and surrender to the pain is overwhelming. But a vision of my 10-month-old son helps me find the strength to fight. In my mind, it is clear that I have made a choice: I've decided to live.

The collapse of the towers takes thousands of lives, among them hundreds of my friends and colleagues, but I am fortunate to reach Weill Cornell's William Randolph Hearst Burn Center. I am sedated in a drug-induced coma state for more than six weeks before I next open my eyes, and I battle single-digit odds to survive for almost two months.

▶ November 11, 2001
While I am still unable to walk or even sit up, I'm able to speak again for the first time. I surprise my husband, Greg, by whispering 'hello' as he walks into my hospital room.

▶ December 12, 2001
I arrive at Burke Rehabilitation Hospital where I began an even more intensive schedule of the rigorous physical and occupational therapy that I began to receive at Weill Cornell. When I see my face in the mirror for the first time, my eyes are the same but my face has the look of a defeated boxer, and I turn to Greg and say, "I wish my tears could wash away my scars."

▶ March 11, 2002
Tyler, who was just 10 months old when I was injured, has been a frequent visitor at Burke; he's masteed walking down its seemingly endless hallways. Greg, who has been sending notes to friends and family from my bedside, each one signed "Love, Greg & Lauren," publishes his collected e-mails in what will become a best-selling book. As this first part of my story becomes known, countless thousands of strangers send letters of encouragement.

▶ March 15, 2002
Six months and four days after leaving for work, I return home to stand once again on the cobblestones of Perry Street. I walk arm in arm with Greg back into our apartment, as my son, the beacon of hope who guided me home, takes his afternoon nap. We share a slice of the birthday cake that has been kept in the freezer since I missed the party for his first birthday.

TIMOTHY LEE
▶ Laura Manning stands tall today.

▶ September 11, 2002
The weather is once again brilliantly clear, but high winds have caused debris to fall from the AOL Time Warner tower (then under construction). With Greg's help, I needed to walk many blocks to catch a taxi to arrive in time to speak during the ceremony. I was in the early stages of healing, and every step brought fatigue and pain. I tell the families I wish to remember their lost loved ones as they lived, not as they died, and for a few moments the feelings for so many no longer with us takes a form other than tears.

▶ Fall 2002
I am the keynote speaker for the convention of the New York State Occupational Therapy Association. I am named one of Glamour Magazine's Women of the Year for 2002, and I am given the award by Hillary Clinton. I first met Clinton while at Burke, where her warmth and her willingness to listen immediately put me at ease. I receive an Anti-Defamation League "Without Fear" award.

▶ June 2004
I am a torchbearer as the Olympic Flame is carried through Manhattan. I jog three blocks with it, as Tyler calls out, "Mom, you're an excellent runner."

▶ Summer 2004
I ride a bicycle again, and Greg and I attend the third annual Cantor Fitzgerald Relief Fund White Party in honor of Gary Lutnick, the younger brother of Howard Lutnick, the CEO of Cantor Fitzgerald, and Edie Lutnick, who became the director of the Cantor Fitzgerald Relief Fund.

▶ Spring 2007
After many years living downtown, we move uptown. Tyler enters the first grade. After years of grinding surgeries, I am finally feeling stronger but still face therapy. We have been trying to have a child since 2004.

▶ August 25, 2009
Away on a family vacation in Rome, we are finally able to tell Tyler that he will be having a baby brother.

▶ October 22, 2009
Our second son, Jagger, is born with the help of a wonderful woman who serves as our gestational surrogate. His arrival returns us to a world of innocence and trust that was taken when Tyler was just 10 months old.

▶ June 19, 2010
For Father's Day, Tyler, Greg and I return to the Central Park Zoo, this time bringing Jagger for his first visit. The miracle as I stand with Tyler is that 10 months have become 10 years and I am still by his side. I marvel at the ability within all of us to survive and to heal.

SOLOMON D. LEACH
sleach@metro.us

Milestones I remember

▶ November 17, 2001
Returning to Tyler has been my overriding goal. At last we are reunited, and he recognizes me as his mother and does not turn away. I sing him a song with my newly regained voice, and I tell Greg the reunion was everything I fought to live for.

▶ March 30, 2002
Our friend Debra, with whom we shared a house during August 2001, holds a welcome home party for me, where I am at last able to laugh again with the friends who have shown me such great support.

▶ May 13, 2002
For Mother's Day we take Tyler to the Central Park Children's Zoo. I am nervous that the sun and the crowds may be too much; but that afternoon I learn to move beyond such fears, replenished by my son's curiosity and innocent joy.

▶ Fall 2002
Buoyed by so many messages of hope and love, I continue to meet small physical milestones amidst continued surgery. I am now able to go for short walks and play with Tyler a little more freely. Greg begins working at Cantor Fitzgerald to assist in the firm's rebuilding.

▶ Summer 2005
I help Tyler learn to ride a bicycle, just as I had to re-learn to ride the year before. Greg and I begin to seriously contemplate having another child. I volunteer to help the Cantor Fitzgerald Relief Funds White Party as a co-chair to help raise money. Greg's band plays at the events; we do this for four years.

▶ Present
I realized every day I had a choice, and that my choice was very clear: I had to do whatever it took to get to out of the hospital and home to my family. We all wake up every day with the choice of how we're going to live our lives and face our challenges.

Talking points

Madonna is no Coppola

Madonna brought her directorial debut, "W.E.," to the Venice International Film Festival last week, but the critical drubbing her work received was hardly welcoming. The film, about American socialite Wallace Simpson and starring Abbie Cornish, was dubbed "an extraordinarily silly, preening, fatally mishandled film" by the Guardian. Variety declared that, "burdened with risible dialogue and weak performances, the pic doesn't have much going for it." The singer and first-time director will next head to the Toronto International Film Festival next week.

Murphy to host the Oscars?

Eddie Murphy may have a new gig as the host of next year's Oscars, according to Deadline. The "Shrek" star is reportedly at the top of the list for director Brett Ratner, who is producing the awards show, and Murphy is said to be "showing interest," sources say. Murphy nearly secured Oscar gold himself for his role in "Dreamgirls," but many believe his poorly received comedy "Norbit," released during Academy voting, dashed his chances.

Lopez cries on set of 'Idol'

Tensions are high at "American Idol" as Jennifer Lopez and Steven Tyler prepare for their second season as judges. "Me and Randy [Jackson] and Steve got into our first fight. I got really, really upset," Lopez tells Ryan Seacrest during a radio interview. The row was apparently over the audition of a female singer whom Lopez found impressive but Tyler and Jackson wanted to dismiss. "She was amazing," Lopez says. "I thought I was being Punk'd. How can we let this girl go? I was upset."

Children of war become 'Children of Paranoia'

Imagine being born into a shady, underground war where anyone you meet may be your mortal enemy This is the world of Trevor Shane's debut thriller

Joseph, the lead character in Trevor Shane's debut novel, "Children of Paranoia," is a soldier in a deadly, secret war — a bloody game of tag that's been going on for centuries — in which two sides must kill one another or else be killed themselves. The only guidance they have? "The Rules" (see sidebar). Shane talked to Metro about developing a dystopian premise but how, in the end, he just wants to make your pulse "quicken."

How did the idea of "Children of Paranoia" come about?
The first chapter, where Joseph follows a woman home at night and kills her, jumped into my head. The idea of a secret war going on in the shadows of everyday society arose out of an attempt to make this character who had just committed a horrible act sympathetic, maybe even heroic, without resorting to a oversimplified version of good versus evil.

When in the writing process did "The Rules" come about?
Rules of war always seem somewhat counterintuitive but, when you think about them, they make perfect sense. Once someone has been ordered to break the most basic tenet of modern society — do not kill — they have to be given new rules so that they can maintain some sort of moral center. Once someone is ordered to kill one person, to violate this basic tenet, what's to stop them from killing another? The added factor in "Children of Paranoia" is that no secret war could exist for hundreds of years if it frequently leaked into regular society. Hence, rule No. 1: No killing innocent bystanders.

What's your creative process when you're writing action?
I put readers directly into the action by writing the way a person trapped in the middle of the action would think. There is no room for long sentences. I want the reader to forget that they are reading. I want them to feel their pulse quicken and their skin tingle.

The rules

These are the two rules each side in the war must follow to avoid becoming the target:

- No killing of innocent bystanders.
- No killing anyone under the age of 18.

Joe Jonas on his own

KENNETH CAPPELLO

▶ Joe Jonas is revved up for "FastLife."

The middle brother hits the road with Jay Sean, prepares for 'FastLife'

Joe Jonas has no concern about downsizing.

Following the lead of his younger brother Nick, he's starting up a solo career. He'll release his debut album, "FastLife" next month and he's uniting with U.K. R&B star Jay Sean for an American coheadlining tour. A European trek opening for Britney Spears will follow that tour.

Going from a band that was wantonly compared to the Beatles (possibly more for popularity rather than artistic output) to being an opening act and coheadliner doesn't seem to bother Jonas at all.

"It's exciting. I'm never the kind of person that looks for things too much to feel disappointed about — you know, what type of venues I'm playing, how many records are sold," Jonas tells Metro. "Having the opportunity to play music and to tour, and to be honest and do what I love, that makes me happy. All the rest will come with it, if it does. If it doesn't, I'm still going to be thankful for what I have."

Though Jonas's solo album attracts plenty of fan and media attention, it is not the huge hoopla the Jonas Brothers drew during their peak. Metro wonders if Jonas feels under less pressure now.

"It can sometimes be even more pressure, just because you put the pressure on yourself to be the best you can be," he says. "Also, when there's less people in the room, that's when I get nervous. It's when it's a huge audience you feel like it's just a sea of people. It's not really one or two. Eighty or 800 people staring you down, it's a totally different thing."

Jay Sean and his 'Mistress'

While Joe Jonas is releasing his solo debut, Jay Sean has two releases: His fourth album "Freeze Time" and a mix-tape project titled "The Mistress," which he says is, "more explicit, based around the theme of promiscuity." Purity ring, anyone?

DON'T REGRET ACCEPTING A JOB OFFER

Are you currently at a job that you dislike? A new report by AOL Jobs says that you're not alone — more than 50 percent of people regret having taken their job. Most people land in the wrong job because they aren't picky enough in their job search; they are looking for a paycheck above all else, and money can't buy you happiness! Here are three ways to choose the right job from the start.

1. Think hard about the career you want to establish.
Each job is supposed to support your overall career path. You need to become more self-aware and figure out what your true strengths are and what makes you different from everyone else. Ask your friends, family and previous employers for feedback on career choices, as well. Do some projects on the side of your job search to get a better feeling about what you like and you don't like about different industries and professions.

Quoted

"A job interview is not just for the employer! You should be critical of the companies you're applying to."

2. Research companies that can help you build your career.
Start by going on sites like Glassdoor.com and Hoovers.com or reviewing Fortune Magazine's "100 Best Companies to Work For" list. This will give you a good idea of what companies are out there and what they offer employees in terms of work environment, benefits and salaries. Then, once you've narrowed your list to around five companies, jump on social networks and start engaging with employees who have positions that interest you. This way, you get a better feel for the type of people who work there and can start establishing your network.

3. Know the corporate environment before taking the job.
A job interview is not just for the employer! You should be critical of the type of companies you're applying to. You need to feel like you fit into the corporate culture and that you can get along with people there — because you'll be seeing them every day.

▶ The Grateful Dead, circa 1970. They'd play live regularly until Jerry Garcia's death in 1995.

How the Grateful Dead became unlikely business consultants

When he realized his favorite band was also an extremely well-oiled moneymaking machine, Barry Barnes paid closer attention The author on 'Everything I Know About Business I Learned from the Grateful Dead'

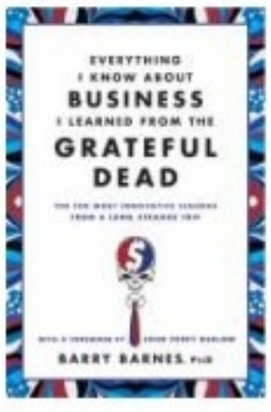
In his youth, Barry Barnes was pretty square, especially by late '60s standards: He was a business major working in IT for IBM. But then in 1972, he heard the Grateful Dead for the first time. "Was it a shift in consciousness? Yeah, I guess you could say that," he explains.

He spent the next 17 years attempting to keep his patchouli-scented tie-dyes in the closet as he pursued an MBA and later worked as an executive at John Deere — until 1989, when inspiration struck: What could the Grateful Dead teach the business world?

"I could see the dramatic changes in the economy, and I saw businesses struggling to adapt," he explains. "The music was speaking to me in a nonverbal language, saying: 'Look, you talk about adaptability? Here it is. Teamwork? Creativity? Innovation? Reaching out to your customers? These guys know how to do this better than anybody.'"

He promptly quit his job and began a doctoral program at the University of Kansas, where he hoped to study the "organizational principles of the Grateful Dead."

"Teamwork? Creativity? Innovation? Reaching out to your customers? These guys know how to do this better than anybody." BARRY BARNES



Barnes' research came to international prominence after being featured heavily in a 2010 Atlantic Magazine article on the Dead. Now, after 20 years of study, "Everything I Know About Business I Learned from the Grateful Dead: The Ten Most Innovative Lessons from a Long, Strange Trip," is set to hit bookstores in November.

"The people that I interviewed in the Grateful Dead organization were on the business side. They weren't in the band. For the band, it's easy to say [they didn't plan anything]," says Barnes. "But you can't have a successful organization that tours the country nonstop for 30 years without a whole lot of planning going on."

Hippie bait

"[Generation Yers] are looking for organizations that embrace what we would call 'corporate social responsibility,'" says Barnes. "This was at the heart of the Grateful Dead. They've given away so much over the years to nonprofit organizations."

Rental, used textbooks cheaper than digital

▶ According to an analysis by CampusBooks.com, e-books are rarely the cheapest option ▶ Rental texts still the best bargain for students

While digital textbooks are typically more affordable than new paper books, one study suggests that price alone might not be enough to sway customers toward digital when rental and used books are on the market.

The analysis, which was conducted by textbook price comparison site CampusBooks.com, compared prices for 1,000 textbook titles across the site's partnerships with 12 textbook rental companies, 35 used-book retailers and seven digital textbook creators. It found that for about 81 percent of these books, renting a paper version was the cheapest available option. The price of used paper books beat out rental fees about 11 percent of the time, and e-books — which, like rentals, are usually sold for use during a 130- or 180-day period — had the most affordable price in about 8 percent of cases.

Quoted

"Until the number of students choosing digital books starts to eat into the availability of used books, it's unlikely that e-books will be the cheapest option the majority of the time."

While the saved costs of physical manufacturing and shipping make price an advertised selling point for many e-textbook retailers, a student who is making purchasing decisions based solely on cost will likely find a better deal elsewhere.

CampusBooks.com CEO Jeff Cohen says that prices across all book formats shift frequently and that e-textbooks tend to become the cheapest option for a given title when used books are harder to find.

"There's definitely not a clear winner of who is cheapest all the time," Cohen says.

History lesson: US prosperity

RE: "FACT OR FICTION? FED AS SAVIOR": In response to Kelly Donnoe's statement that "The New Deal, WWII and the Federal Reserve made the depression worse": This is another example of trying to rewrite history to justify your opinions. You are entitled to your opinion; but to make a valid argument, supplement your opinion with facts. Fact: In 1933 (when New Deal policy was starting to be enacted) the unemployment rate in the U.S. was 24.9 percent. In 1936, unemployment was 16.9 percent. In 1942 the rate was 4.7 percent. Hmm ...
MEGAN TOWEY, VIA E-MAIL

In the 1700s we were agrarian, close to the land and more self-sufficient. What separated us from that was not the New Deal, but the growth of the industrial revolution in the 1800s with a series of booms, busts, panics, monopolies, stock swindles, etc. The New Deal minimized starvation and brought much-needed regulation and insurance and the greatest period of economic stability, prosperity and middle class growth in history.
HARRY THORN, VIA E-MAIL

Will we take care of rivals?

All right smart libertarians, let's say we drop FEMA and let the states deal with their own natural disasters. How many Republican governors will come to the help of Democratic states and vice and versa? Which Republican would help socialist Vermont; which Democrat would help the land of Michele Bachmann?
SUZY SANDOR, VIA E-MAIL

Corrupting influences

Economics 101: Wealth is created by human work and nature's resources in tandem. Bankers usurp it by control — stealing it through usury and loaning it to themselves via shadow companies. Then they bribe the legislature to steal the very process of its creation. For the people, it is all downhill from there. A new paradigm is needed. CHARLES MICHAEL COUCH, VIA E-MAIL

The religion of our denial

The silence of our alleged religious leaders is deafening in reaction to the ban of clergy at the upcoming 9/11 ceremony and the ban of the word "God" at military cemeteries! Will Christians and Jews turn the other cheek until they just fall over and die?

Get to know

Southeast Ireland

HEIDI PATALANO/METRO

▶ Arthurstown, in County Wexford, is home to the Dunbrody House Hotel.

Most tourists to Ireland tend to hit Dublin and then head to the rocky cliffs of Galway on the west coast, but we'll give you plenty of reasons why you should linger on the island's other end

Most people who vacation in Ireland take a predictable route, most often landing in Dublin first and then heading west to Galway or north to Belfast. But it's the southeastern coastline that has many unexpected treasures to mine. Here's our look at just a few of the best attractions to see in the southeast counties.

heidi.patalano@metro.us

Dublin

Trinity College: www.tcd.ie
St. Patrick's Cathedral: www.stpatrickscathedral.ie
Dublin Writer's Museum: www.writersmuseum.com
Shelbourne Hotel: www.marriott.co.uk
Guinness: www.guinness.com

Dublin is and always should be your first stop on this tour of Southeast Ireland. The downtown area is relatively small and easy to explore on foot. Any tourist worth his salt will head for Trinity College in order to see the Book of Kells (an elaborately illustrated Latin text of the four Gospels of the Christian bible, created around 800 A.D. by Irish monks), along with St. Patrick's Cathedral and the Dublin Writer's Museum. The more discerning visitor would make his way to the Shelbourne Hotel on what is considered Ireland's most famous park, St. Stephen's Green. The Number 27 Bar and Horseshoe Bar at the Shelbourne are attractive hot spots for celebrity spotting and artisan cocktails. But more importantly, don't forget to stop into a pub for a pint of Guinness.

County Wicklow

Glendalough: www.glendalough.connect.ie
Powerscourt House and Gardens: www.powerscourt.ie

Just outside of Dublin, Wicklow is often referred to as The Garden of Ireland. The history buff will enjoy a visit to Glendalough, a monastic settlement founded in the sixth century — but the lover of luxury will appreciate the sprawling estate of Powerscourt, with manicured gardens borrowing from Japanese and French designs.

County Wexford

Dunbrody Famine Ship: www.dunbrody.com
Dunbrody House: www.dunbrodyhouse.com

One of the greatest points of interest here is the Dunbrody Famine Ship, restored to the conditions of the ship when it carried families escaping the potato famine from 1845 to 1851. Next, stay at the Dunbrody Country House Hotel. Attached to 1830s Georgian estate is the Dunbrody Cookery School, which hosts cooking demos and classes.

County Waterford

Waterford Crystal: www.waterfordvisitorcentre.com
The Cliff House Hotel: www.thecliffhousehotel.com

Check out Waterford Crystal's revamped museum. Nearby, the Cliff House is an attraction in and of itself, with most of the hotel's rooms only several feet from the crashing waves of the coastline. The Michelin-starred House restaurant provides one of the most interesting meals you'll ever eat.

County Kilkenny

www.kilkennycastle.ie

Start making your way back up to Dublin by going northeast to Kilkenny, which, like Waterford, is one of the classic stops on a southeast tour of Ireland. The enormous 900-year-old Kilkenny Castle has rooms and rooms loaded with historical furniture and tapestries along with a charming Victorian tea room. But if the castle's not your thing, there's also the charming Kilkenny City itself, which offers tons of great shops, friendly locals and little avenues to stroll down.

County Kildare

Barberstown Castle: www.barberstowncastle.ie

Well, you've done a lot of walking and now those dogs are tired. The easiest way to get your fix for royal relaxation is to spend an evening at a castle such as Barberstown in County Kildare. While it was owned by Eric Clapton in the 1970s, the building itself dates back to the 13th century. The dining and wine selection at the castle's restaurant can't be beat for a taste of regally appointed luxury.

Nothing murky in these Waters

Patriots' newest big-name signing thinks he'll get the hang of RG fast
Deal should help Brady, running game Waters a five-time Pro Bowler

Brian Waters made his name — and five Pro Bowl teams — as a left guard for the Kansas City Chiefs.

But Logan Mankins anchors that side of the line in New England.

That means Waters — the Patriots' newest high-profile free agent — is expected to shift to the right this season, stepping in for the injured Dan Connolly, Ryan Wendell and Rich Ohrnberger.

The veteran said yesterday he doesn't expect the move to be an issue.

"You just have to flip everything in your mind when you've been doing something for a long time," Waters said. "I don't think it will take me too long to get it."

The signing of the two-time All Pro — who was cut by K.C. in July — helps the Pats protect their biggest asset, Tom Brady.

GETTY IMAGES

Waters is aging, but he's still considered a top guard.

But it also opens up the running game: With Waters on the line, the Chiefs rushed for a league-high 54 first downs and 36 carries of 10 or more yards over the left side.

Waters said yesterday he had numerous options after leaving K.C., but found Foxborough to be the right fit.

"Great football organization, he said. "Starts from the top. From the owner, the head coach, the coaches — I've had the opportunity in the Pro Bowl to be around the coaching staff a few times — and I know a number of their players.

"I think this is as good as it gets."

The feeing, it seems, is mutual.

"I think his playing style is one that we feel like — the way that he plays the position is kind of the way we feel like we would want it played," coach Bill Belichick said.

Running deep

Waters' road to stardom has had its share of bumps along the way.

- Waters then spent early 2000 in NFL Europe before landing in Kansas City.

Beckett in Hub to test injured ankle

Righty exited yesterday's game at Toronto in fourth inning Red Sox lost on walkoff home run in the 11th

The Red Sox lost to the Blue Jays, 1-0, in 11 innings yesterday.

That wasn't the worst part of their afternoon.

Ace right-hander Josh Beckett left the game with two outs in the fourth inning after spraining his ankle on a delivery. He's scheduled to return to Boston today to have the joint checked by foot specialist Dr. George Theodore.

"I've never had it happen before," Beckett said. "It's something in my ankle. I'm not sure what."

If the injury is anything serious, the timing could not be much worse for the Sox. Just 22 games separate them from the playoffs, and they're 2.5 back of the Yankees in the AL East.
